

Ways Security Camera System and Security System Differ

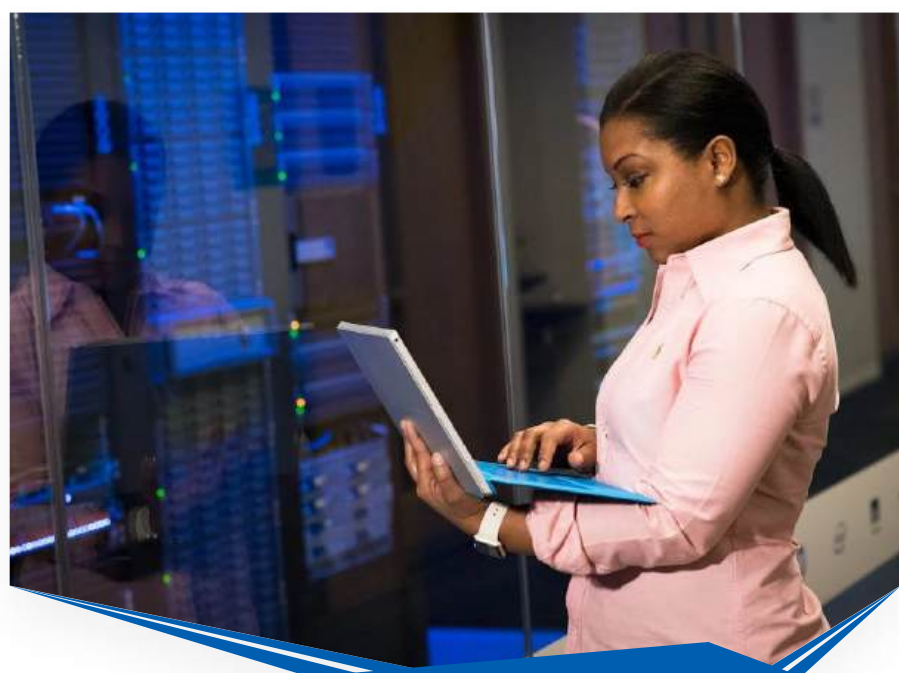

1. Functionality

A security camera system is like your trusty neighborhood watch, always keeping an eye out for suspicious activity. It's got cameras, recording equipment, motion detection, and night vision. On the other hand, a full security system is like having a whole team of security guards on your side. It combines cameras with alarms, motion detectors, and even smart home tech to actively protect your property and alert you and the authorities if something happens.

2. Monitoring and Alerts

With a camera system, you're in control of monitoring. You can check in on your property anytime from your phone or computer. Some systems even send you alerts if they detect something out of the ordinary. With a full security system, you hand over the steering wheel to a security company. If an alarm goes off, they're ready to assess the situation and call in reinforcements if needed.

3. Cost and Installation

A camera system is usually easier on the wallet upfront. While some home or business owners may attempt to install their own system, a professional installer knows all the ins and outs of installation. Full security systems can be more of an investment and often require professional installation. And the 24/7 monitoring is not a free add-on.

4. Smart Home Integration

While many view camera systems as surveillance systems, advanced CCTV camera systems integrate well with other smart home technology to help keep your property secure. Full security systems can also work seamlessly with your smart locks, lights, and more, allowing you to control everything from a single place.

5. Peace of Mind

Camera systems let you keep a watchful eye on your property, which is great for monitoring deliveries, vulnerable areas, visitors, or precious possessions. Full security systems take it a step further by combining video with active protection and security alerts. They provide not just surveillance but backup security measures.
